Progressive Resistance

Progressive resistance is what a rider experiences on the road. When moving at about 5mph. on a flat surface, there is little resistance. However, the faster the rider goes, the more friction occurs between him/her and the surrounding air. The resistance working against a rider increases exponentially the faster he/she goes. This is the type of resistance provided by wind and fluid trainers.

Linear Resistance

Linear Resistance can best be likened to pulling around a 40lb. weight attached to a length of rope. As you move faster, you exert energy in direct proportion to the speed at which you move. Magnetic trainers increase linear resistance by increasing magnetic friction. Rollers use your bicycles gearing. Either way, the effort you expend will increase with your speed.

Road Clincher Tires

New materials and innovations such as low durometer rubber and Kevlar weaving techniques make today's clinchers better than ever. Tire manufacturers like Michelin, Vittoria, Panaracer, and Ritchey are producing clinchers that are more responsive, hold higher pressures, resist sidewall punctures, and are less susceptible to sun and acid rain damage. With today's tires you'll get more miles and speed than ever before.

Our Favorites:

Michelin Bi-Synergic - low durometer cornering strips, strong sidewalls, and a special bead for higher pressures.

Ritchey Road Force - Super-strong sidewalls and force directional tread design for excellent cornering, low rolling resistance, and higher pressures.

Vittoria Techno Twin Tread - low durometer side strips, strong sidewalls and multi-directional weave for smooth and fast rides.

Panaracer Cat 1 - light tread for low rolling resistance and good cornering, multi-directional puncture-proof Kevlar weave under sidewall and tread surface, special bead for higher pressures.
